Spotlight: Paul Melvin

Father of four Paul Melvin was ready to make big changes after spending much of his adult life in and out of prison. He enrolled in New Pathways for Good Dads to try to get back on track. He told Good Dads last month that he owes much of his current successes to the New Pathways program.

The fight against poverty, crime, mental health problems and school concerns has never been easy, but when we work together to restore fathers' hope, we more effectively address a variety of social concerns. When fathers have the tools they need to be good dads, relationships flourish; schools are stronger; neighborhoods are safer; the economy is more robust. With your support, we can serve many hundreds more at-risk dads throughout the state.
